In 1998, Elza Adamowicz wrote on the Surrealist game Exquisite Corpse as a method that dismantles singular authorship and linear meaning, revealing how collective production generates knowledge through fragmentation, chance, and relational assembly. The game constructs a body whose coherence emerges only through the accumulation of partial, often dissonant contributions. This repertoire of automatic and deliberate process, perhaps allotropic in nature, operates through the displacement of intention.<sup>[1]</sup> This produces a form of collective cognition akin to a hive mind, one that does not erase individual agency, but redistributes it across a network of contributors.

Within this configuration, no single participant governs the outcome. Each work of art is shaped by individual experience yet inseparable from the whole. Biophilia: Exquisite Corpse unfolds from the understanding that humans do not stand outside nature, but circulate within it, like water moving outward from a single point of contact, or the concentric rings of a tree recording time. The exhibition positions art as a collective act of environmental resistance and reimagination, where making becomes a way of sensing, responding to, and inhabiting a shared ecological condition.

Unpredictability, in this sense, operates as method. Drawing on strategies of chance, as articulated by John Cage, hierarchical composition is dismantled, allowing definition to emerge through indeterminacy.<sup>[2]</sup> They interrupt one another, forming a composite body shaped by chance and partial knowledge. At its ethical core, the presentation asks what it means to situate ourselves as participants rather than masters, bound by shared responsibility, vulnerability, and consequence.

I. Mother Earth

Across cultures, the earth has been figured as maternal, a giver of life. It is active and demanding. The Earth is neither inert nor symbolic. It is addressed as Ibu Bumi, an entity bound to human survival through reciprocity and consequence. To speak of Mother Earth in this context is to recognize a living union. Humans emerge from the earth, depend on it, and return to it. The boundary between body and land is porous. Earth is not external to life. It is life's condition. This understanding positions the earth as an entity beyond ground or resource. The earth remembers. It writes history without fixing. It teaches without instruction. To encounter the earth is to enter a system that exceeds total human control.

Akin to a mother's belly, Teguh Ostenrik's Domus Anguillae, or House of Eels, presented through moving images, reframes sculpture as an interior space of protection and gestation. Submerged beneath the sea, the work functions as an artificial reef. Over time, coral growth, marine organisms, and sediment transform the structure, rendering the work incomplete without ecological participation. Though it may seem that the work could be understood as an archive, it does not preserve or stabilize memory. What it holds is mutable. The sea does not record in a linear or legible manner. It gathers traces unevenly, allowing some forms to surface while others dissolve. Earth is knowledge that unfolds through duration and material change.<sup>[3]</sup> To know the earth is to enter into relation with it.

Following Teguh Ostenrik's articulation of the earth as an ontological site and shared habitat, Anang Saptoto's Jimat Anti Tuyul shifts attention to everyday ecological relations ingrained in domestic labour. Developed from the long-term project Panen Apa Hari Ini (Pari), the work traces the history of the artist's grandmother's food stall and her cooking practices between 1956 and 2013. This process reveals how knowledge circulates through routine acts of exchange. In the modern era, such practices are often dismissed as outdated or backward. However, practices such as the keeping of talismans operate as mediums through which ecological relationships are formed and maintained. The talisman itself, traditionally stored inside the cash drawer, is assembled from agricultural materials such as chili, garlic, pepper, and glass. These elements link food production, belief, and economic survival within a single gesture. For Saptoto, such traditions function as a tool of transformation that connects humans with other entities. This perspective shifts attention beyond human-centered needs toward relational systems that sustain life.

II. Extracting Earth

In this chapter, the earth is no longer mother. What was once figured as Mother Earth becomes ground, deposit, site. The earth is reduced to matter to be violated, drilled, and entered. Extraction does not ask permission. It assumes availability. Extraction is not only a physical act. It is an epistemic operation. It requires the earth to be made legible, divisible, and silent. Land is mapped, named, and quantified until it can be owned. Knowledge is no longer encountered through duration but seized through intervention. Mother Earth is stripped of kinship and recast as infrastructure. What extraction produces is not only environmental damage but a reordering of relations.

<sup>[3]</sup> Smith, J.L. (2021) 'Anxieties of Access: Remembering as a Lake', Environmental Humanities, 13(1), pp. 245–263. <https://doi.org/10.1215/22011919-8867296>

The earth is positioned beneath the human, emptied of agency and sovereignty. This rupture is historical, systemic, and ongoing. Earth Defender by Studio Birthplace opens this chapter by grounding the question of extraction in Indigenous cosmologies that predate industrial notions of land as resource, which results in murderous tendencies. Drawing from the lived knowledge of Dayak communities, the work foregrounds Indigenous stewardship as an active practice of safeguarding biodiversity across generations. Anthropological studies of traditional agriculture in Indigenous contexts emphasize that ecological balance is maintained through reciprocal relationships between all that breathes.<sup>[4]</sup>

“The land is our Mother, the river is our blood”

Knowledge is transmitted intergenerationally as ritual, cultivation, and seasonal cycles. To harm the land is to sever continuity between past and future, placing collective survival at risk. The work recognizes Indigenous resilience as a form of ecological intelligence that confronts cultural and environmental crises simultaneously. This framing establishes a critical threshold for the chapter. From this point onward, extraction is no longer understood as an economic process alone, but as a moral rupture.

When Earth Defender traces violence, Fitri DK's practice insists on listening to the earth at the moment it is injured. Rooted in the resistance movements of the Kendeng mountains, her work draws from Nyawiji Ibu Bumi, a cosmology in which human life, land, and ethical responsibility are continuous rather than separate. The earth is not a backdrop to social struggle but an active participant within it. Addressed as Ibu Bumi, the land is understood as a living entity capable of memory, response, and refusal. This understanding aligns with ecofeminist critiques that reject the framing of nature as passive resource. Thinkers such as Vandana Shiva<sup>[5]</sup> and Carolyn Merchant<sup>[6]</sup> have argued that extractive economies depend on feminizing the earth in order to justify domination, positioning land as endlessly giving and politically silent.

Nevertheless, Fitri's work disrupts this logic. Ibu Bumi gives, but also withholds. Within the Kendeng struggle against cement mining, this reciprocity becomes a political framework. The earth is entreated as a sustainer of agriculture and as witness to harm. Works such as Mantra Ibu Bumi translate this collective resistance into visual rhythm. Inspired by protest songs chanted during demonstrations in Rembang and Pati, the triptych functions as invocation and warning. These mantras operate as ethical tools. They remind participants that extraction carried out under the language of development constitutes a breach of obligation. Environmental disasters such as floods, landslides, and drought are not treated as random or external events, but as consequences of sustained injury. This view parallels Indigenous epistemologies discussed in environmental anthropology, where land responds to misuse through disruption.

This ethic of accountability augments into Selamatan Bumi, which draws from the Javanese ritual of Kupatan Kendeng. The act of mengaku lepat, acknowledging wrongdoing, expands apology beyond human relationships to include the land itself. This gesture challenges dominant legal and political frameworks that restrict responsibility to human actors and institutions. Fitri's batik does not document ritual. It performs it. The material becomes a site where confession, gratitude, and repair are enacted rather than represented. Tenda Perjuangan marks a shift from ritual to occupation. Referencing the protest tents erected by Kendeng residents at mining sites and government offices, the work frames non-violent resistance as prolonged exposure. These tents, often burned or forcibly dismantled, embody vulnerability as strategy. In translating the tent into batik, Fitri transforms textile from surface into shelter. The work carries the memory of bodies that waited, negotiated, and refused displacement. Across these works, the maternal figure of the earth resists sentimentalization. This is not an image of care detached from struggle. It is a demand for accountability entrenched in land, labor, and belief. Fitri positions Mother Earth as an ethical horizon. To maim the land is to fracture relation. To listen is to accept consequence.

When land is rendered inert, belief systems that once sustained reciprocity are flattened into dogma or erased altogether. Extraction, in this sense, is not only environmental but epistemological. It strips the earth of voice and simultaneously disciplines the ways people are allowed to speak about it. Arahmaiani's practice reactivates ancestral linguistic forms that once bridged regions, cultures, and faiths across the archipelago. Drawing from the syncretic foundations of Nusantara traditions, her work insists on plurality as a lived condition rather than an abstract ideal. Born into a religious family, Arahmaiani approaches spiritual language critically, situating belief within social reality rather than hierarchy or dogma. This position directly challenges Eurocentric assumptions that frame the region as rigid or intolerant, instead foregrounding a long history of coexistence and negotiation across differences. The work's use of repurposed materials, including industrial remnants such as barrel lids in related iterations, extends this ethic into the environmental realm. Arahmaiani's long-standing activism has consistently linked ecological damage with ideological violence. Extraction, militarization, and religious fundamentalism are understood as interconnected systems that strip land and bodies of agency. In this context, the earth is not separate from language or belief. Arahmaiani positions environmental responsibility and cultural pluralism as inseparable, proposing coexistence as both an ecological and ethical necessity.

III. After Earth

After Earth does not imagine a world without land. It names a condition shaped by damage, adaptation, and survival within altered terrains. This chapter gathers practices that emerge after extraction, and after the fantasy of repair as return. The earth is no longer whole, stable, or recoverable. It is fragmented, mediated, and reconfigured through human systems that continue to shape how life persists. If earlier chapters position the earth as relation and then as site of violence, After Earth attends to what remains when those relations have been strained or broken. The works assembled do not offer restoration or closure. They operate within compromised environments where care, memory, and material circulation are renegotiated under constraint. Life continues, but unevenly. Across these practices, the earth appears as residue and speculative material. It is encountered through manufactured systems, displaced ecologies, and secondary forms of nurture.

Reza Kutjh's practice examines land transformation as mnemonic loss. Working through video, photography, and textile-based collage, his long-term project Periphery of the Wind traces shifts in land use along the southern coast of Java, particularly areas affected by the construction of Yogyakarta International Airport. Former agricultural and fishing zones once used for rice, watermelon, and fishponds have been converted into sand mines, shrimp farms, ports, wave breakers, and aviation infrastructure. The project is informed by interviews with displaced residents, though people are never directly shown. Instead, memory is carried through landscape, ruins, and material traces. This ethical distance positions the work as a counter-archive, assembling visual and oral fragments that resist official narratives of development. Sand, Steel, and Those Who Remain (2026) translates these observations into two fabric panels printed with collaged debris sourced from collapsing coastal structures. The work marks the persistence of collective life amid erasure. The Oblique Rays of the Afternoon Sun (2026) documents mangrove ecosystems that function simultaneously as wave mitigation, wildlife habitat, and contested sites under ecotourism agendas. Together, the works frame land as a living record of intervention, where what remains is shaped by the endurance of memory and unresolved struggle.

Nature is no longer accessed directly, but filtered through objects, technologies, and lived contingencies. What grows does so within limits imposed by design, policy, and history. Rather than mourning a lost origin, After Earth asks how humans live with what they have made. It examines survival not as resilience rhetoric, but as a series of fragile negotiations between memory, material, and responsibility.

Mater Design Lab operates within the aftermath of extraction, transforming industrial waste into new material cycles. Their research focuses on liquid waste from tofu production, one of Indonesia's most widespread food industries and a major contributor to river pollution due to insufficient wastewater treatment. Through the STREAM project, tofu wastewater from home industries in Serandakan, Bantul is processed into biodegradable soya paper. Using computational design and auto-generated patterns, the studio produces three-dimensional lighting objects from flat sheets, eliminating the need for internal structures. The material can be composted at the end of its lifecycle. The work does not seek to return to nature, but to re-engineer sustainability through design systems, optimization, and controlled material flows. Growth is simulated, not organic. Within After Earth, Mater Design Lab reflects a condition where care is mediated through technology, and ecological repair operates within industrial constraints.

Cynthia Delaney Suwito's new work extends her Pottered Pots series through an installation shaped by repeated failure to keep potted plants alive. Trained in Singapore, Cynthia collects the pots from these dead plants, forming a personal archive of attempted care. For Biophilia: Exquisite Corpse, she presents a vertical tower of pots reaching up to 2.2 meters. Instead of living plants, photographic prints of the original pots are embedded into the structure. The installation draws from typologies in urban housing, or HDBs, Singapore's state-built public housing system, where most residents live in vertically stacked apartments, often separated from direct contact with the ground. This mirrors how plants are commonly cultivated indoors rather than planted in soil. The work carries a subdued sense of grief, but resists disposal. By preserving the pots and replicating growth through images, Suwito reflects on how humans attempt to nurture life through substitution, repetition, and mass production. Growth persists, but only as a mediated form.

Turning toward the interior afterlife of severance, Dabi Arnasa creates Mirror and the Fire Lily. A human figure stands before a mirror that reflects only their back, producing distance between the present self and past experience. The surrounding landscape appears fractured and silent, extending this psychological separation into space. From this damaged terrain, a fire lily emerges. The flower does not precede destruction; it grows only after fire has passed. It marks survival without resolution, and renewal without erasure of loss. Dabi's work does not offer closure. It holds a moment of stillness where damage is acknowledged and life continues in altered form. Within After Earth, the painting positions recovery as intimate, uncertain, and deeply entangled with memory. The question is no longer how to protect the earth, but how to inhabit a world irreversibly shaped by diminution.

Arahmaiani's I Love You series draws from ancestral linguistic forms that historically connected regions, cultures, and belief systems across the Indonesian archipelago. Rooted in syncretic traditions, her practice approaches language as a living structure shaped by exchange. Born into a religious family, Arahmaiani engages spiritual symbols critically, positioning faith within everyday social reality and long-standing practices of coexistence. This perspective challenges narratives that frame the region as rigid or dogmatic, foregrounding pluralism as a historically embedded condition.

In works that incorporate repurposed industrial materials such as barrel lids, language becomes inseparable from material and ecological context. Discarded objects are transformed into sites of affirmation, linking cultural memory to environmental responsibility. Arahmaiani's practice consistently connects ideological violence, environmental damage, and extraction as interconnected systems that erode both land and social relations. By reactivating language through material reuse, the work frames coexistence as an ethical necessity grounded in care for collective survival.

Mantra Ibu Bumi draws from the songs chanted by Kendeng farmers during protests against cement mining in Central Java. These chants function as collective prayers and reminders, calling on humans to uphold their responsibility toward the land. Addressed to Ibu Bumi, the earth is understood as a living presence that has sustained life but is now subjected to injury through extraction carried out in the name of corporate profit.

The work articulates an ethic of reciprocity in which the earth responds to harm. Practices of mining, draining, and sealing land are framed as violations, with environmental disasters such as floods, landslides, and drought understood as consequences of this imbalance. By translating protest songs into visual form, Mantra Ibu Bumi positions art as a vehicle for moral reckoning, foregrounding care, restraint, and accountability as necessary conditions for coexistence with the land.

Selamatan Bumi is inspired by the Kendeng community's Kupatan Kendeng, a Javanese ritual procession in which cone-shaped arrangements of ketupat are carried through the village as a form of offering. The term kupatan derives from mengaku lepat, meaning to acknowledge wrongdoing. Within this tradition, confession and apology are directed not only toward other humans, but also toward Ibu Bumi, the earth that sustains life.

By extending the act of reconciliation beyond human relations, the ritual reframes ethical responsibility as ecological. In the context of environmental struggle in Rembang, Selamatan Bumi positions apology as a political gesture, recognising the land as a moral subject capable of receiving harm and requiring repair. Fitri DK's work translates this practice into visual form, cultivating a tradition in which human coexistence with the earth is understood as unnegotiable.

Periphery of the Wind emerges from Reza Kutjh's sustained engagement with the southern coastal corridor of Java, a region shaped by successive land conversions driven by infrastructure, extraction, and state development. Grounded in interviews with residents affected by agrarian conflict surrounding the construction of Yogyakarta International Airport, the series assembles visual and material traces of sites undergoing erasure. Through the absence of human figures, the works focus on residual landscapes, architectural fragments, and ecological structures, positioning space as an archive of displacement, memory, and unresolved transition.

Working across collage, moving image, and fabric-based installations, Kutjh examines land-use change as a cumulative process that alters social, ecological, and cultural relations over time. His position as a Javanese artist informs an auto-critical approach that situates the project within personal and inherited geographies of vulnerability. The series extends local narratives of resistance by sustaining their visibility beyond the site, framing land as a contested space shaped by memory, labour, and continued occupation.

Domus Anguillae (House of Eels) is an underwater installation conceived as an artificial reef, functioning simultaneously as sculptural form, ecological infrastructure, and site of regeneration. Submerged off the coast of Tejakula, North Bali, the work consists of a continuous system of six tunnel-like structures extending approximately 60 metres along the seabed. Constructed to support coral attachment and marine habitation, the installation is designed to operate over time, allowing biological growth to transform its surface and structure.

Presented in the exhibition through video documentation, the work foregrounds art as an active environmental intervention. House of Eels addresses coral reef degradation by positioning sculpture as habitat, refuge, and long-term support. The work reframes artistic production as a durational act that unfolds beneath visibility, where form yields to marine life and accumulates through enduring environmental interaction.

Anang Saptoto, A.Md., S.Sn., M.Sn., is a multidisciplinary artist, designer, and activist based in Yogyakarta, Indonesia. He studied Visual Communication Design and Television, and is currently completing a Master's in Video Art. Working across design, painting, photography, video, music, and interdisciplinary art, Anang explores issues of ecology, human rights, disability, children's education, and social change. For him, art is a catalyst for dialogue and solidarity, amplifying marginalized voices through collaboration. Since 2003, he has been part of the art collective MES 56 and, since 2020, one of its Co-Directors through Agensi 56. He founded Panen Apa Hari Ini (PARI), an agriculture-based art initiative, and helped establish the Collaborative Village Architecture Forum and Wana Nagara Pugeran Urban Forest Studio. Anang has received recognition from Young Artist Award, REDBase Foundation (2016), UCLG ASPAC, UN-HABITAT (2020), the Prince Claus Fund SEED Award (2021), and the British Council Unlimited x Micro Award (2022) for his collaborative project Sari-Sari Series with Rhine Bernardino (Philippines).

Arahmaiani is a leading figure in Indonesian contemporary art and a pioneer of performance art in Southeast Asia since the 1980s. Educated at the Bandung Institute of Technology and later in Europe, including the Academy of Fine Arts in Amsterdam, she developed a multidisciplinary practice shaped by diverse international influences. Her work addresses issues such as cultural commodification, environmental degradation, and religious fundamentalism, reflecting her commitment to social justice and human rights. As she states, "Art should challenge the status quo, question our realities, and inspire change." Her works are held in major collections, including the Brooklyn Museum, Museum MACAN Jakarta, Asia Society New York, and the Singapore Art Museum, continuing to inspire dialogue across cultures.

Cynthia Delaney Suwito (b. 1993, Jakarta, Indonesia) is an artist who bends everyday norms to understand and relook at our surroundings. Taking many forms, including sculpture, installation, and digital media, her work is noted for its quiet humour and laborious impracticality. Cynthia's subjects include the misfortunes of plastic bags, the misuse of clothes pegs, and the perpetual turning of toilet paper rolls. She has staged her solo exhibition, while we wait, at The Substation (Singapore, 2020). Notable group exhibitions are Sama Sama (Whitestone Gallery, Singapore, 2025), Singapore International Photography Festival (Peace Centre, Singapore, 2022), Superfluidity: The Parallel Universes Daily Mimicry (FreeS Art Space, Taipei, 2022), Sukses (ISA Art and Design, Jakarta, 2021) and Bandung Contemporary Art Award Assemblage (Lawangwangi, Bandung, 2019). She was among the 2017 FORBES 30 under 30 Asia in the Arts.

I Made Dabi Arnasa, known as Dabi, is a Balinese artist based in Yogyakarta and a graduate of the Indonesia Institute of Art (ISI). His practice explores the surreal nature of dreams, drawing from personal and collective experiences to create imagery that blurs the line between the familiar and the uncanny. Rooted in the Balinese concept of rwa bhineda—the harmony of opposites—his work embraces contradiction and duality. His debut solo exhibition, Cabinet of Dreams (Art Moments Jakarta 2022), introduced this dream-inspired visual language.

Fitri DK is an art worker from Yogyakarta, Indonesia. Fitri DK is also a visual artist who uses graphic art techniques (especially hardboard cut print), exploring various media such as batik, weaving, and coloured pencil to critique and dialogue on social and environmental issues. Fitri DK is committed to raising women's issues through art and music and consistently provides a strong female voice in an extremely patriarchal culture. Fitri DK is a member of SURVIVE! Garage Collective, Taring Padi Collective, and the vocalists of the band Dendang Kampungan. Her activism includes direct involvement, learning, befriending and solidarity with farmers, women's community, and other marginalized groups.

Fitri is currently collecting and documenting stories of resistance and struggles of women and indigenous peoples in environmental conservation efforts through hardboardcut print. Fitri DK has been actively involved in various exhibitions in Indonesia and abroad.

Mater is a speculative design studio which translates matter into objects. Mater creates scenarios for the future by embedding a design fiction approach into its processes, generating questions that provoke imagination and innovation to respond to present conditions.

MATER DESIGN LAB

Ratna Juwita was actively involved in House of Natural Fiber (HONF). She started an initiative project with HONF called Open Apparel, a platform that tries to open new opportunities for the fashion industry in Indonesia, developing secondary industries, increasing employment opportunities and new possibilities.

Zaqi Fathis studied Emergent Technologies and Design at the Architectural Association School of Architecture, London. His research interest is in the intersection between computational design, digital fabrication, and material systems. In 2017, he won an International Competition by Archi-Depot Corporation, Japan, for his research project ACTIVE JOINT SYSTEM.

Ghina Nabilah is a designer and architect who has an interest in sustainability issues, and is also a co-founder of Calapilo & Kidelab. In 2018, she was chosen as a United Nations Local Pathways Fellow. Her recycled plastic project, PLAZZLE, was also exhibited at Rossana Orlandi Gallery for Milan Design Week 2019.

Sarah Rayhana graduated from the Yogyakarta Indonesian Art Institute with a major in Interior Design. Experienced in various activities in organizing exhibitions, festivals or other projects in design, music, culture, and art. Happy to be involved in creative environments across various disciplines, and collaborations have led her to meet Mater Lab and work on many projects in art and design.

Since 2011, Ratna Djuwita has been an active member of House of Natural Fiber (HONF). She initiated Open Apparel, a platform to create opportunities in Indonesia's fashion industry, develop secondary industries, and increase employment. With HONF's support, she co-founded XXLab, a collective exploring art, science, and free technologies. XXLab's notable project, SOYA C(O)U(L)TURE, transforms soya wastewater into sustainable food and leather-like fabrics using bacteria and tissue culture, addressing pollution and promoting low-cost production. In 2020, she advanced her research with Mater Design Lab, a studio she co-founded in Yogyakarta and Dresden, integrating design fiction to explore innovative solutions to current challenges.

Reza Aryanda Manggala Yudha (b.1994) well known as Reza Kutjh is a visual artist and archivist, living and working in Yogyakarta. Kutjh's work is mostly photographic, experimenting with a range of artistic media that intersect with archival practice, moving images, and printed matter. His artistic practice is deeply rooted in spatial memory, shifting space, and daily tactics, in relation to questioning fragility within humanitarian structures. Kutjh held his second solo exhibition, "Around The Wall That Stood Between Us", Ruang MES 56, Yogyakarta (2025). Currently, he is actively doing visual research work and archive-based art projects at Unhistoried. With Unhistoried, he participated in several exhibitions and residency programs, such as Tani Jiwo mini residency 2022, Dieng, and "Titen: Embodied Knowledges-Shifting Grounds" Biennale Jogja 17 (2023); 2nd Jogja Fotografis Festival, Yogyakarta (2024).

Teguh Ostenrik graduated with a Master's in Fine Arts from the Hochschule der Künste, Berlin (West), Germany. For more than 40 years, Teguh has exhibited both domestically and internationally, including the USA, Europe (France, the Netherlands, Germany), Australia, and several Asian countries. Ostenrik's work spans a range of media, including paintings, sculptures, terracotta, installations, video art, dance choreography, and stage settings, reflecting his appreciation for Mother Earth. Ostenrik's work often features recycled materials or earth colours and has been acquired by private collectors and institutions such as Willem de Kooning Studio – USA, St. Mary of the Angels Church – Singapore, The Cross on the Tomohon Prayer Hill – North Sulawesi, and Fukuoka Art Museum – Japan. His notable works include the initiation of the ARTificial Reef Park in Lombok, Indonesia, a project that placed underwater installations as a medium for coral to grow and at the same time creates a new diving destination in 2014 and the documentary "Bisikan Terumbu" (Whisper of the Reef) premiered at ARTJOG 2025.
